Its history dates back to the late Heian period (more than 850 years ago), and today it is recognized as one of Japan's Six Ancient Kilns as well as being designated a Japan Heritage site. The clay used for Echizen pottery contains a high amount of iron and clay minerals, resulting in strong vitrification during firing and a rich variety of natural surface textures. Taking advantage of these qualities, Echizen pottery was traditionally used to produce practical vessels such as jars, storage pots, and mortars, supporting everyday life until the Edo period. In modern times, advances in techniques have enhanced the strength of the clay, allowing for more delicate and refined forms. The spirit of craftsmanship that once supported daily life continues to be passed down today, as contemporary ceramic artists create vessels that harmonize with modern living.
